

children

an Open Access Journal by MDPI

How to Contribute to the Language and Communication Development of Children and Adolescents

Guest Editor:

Dr. Marta Gràcia

Cognition, Development and Psychology of Education,
University of Barcelona,
Barcelona, Spain

Deadline for manuscript
submissions:

closed (5 April 2024)

Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

The family and the school are the first and often the most vital environments for child linguistic development. Given that the school is the child's second social group, it is likely that the child's learning and language development and socialization are highly influenced by their teachers and other children. The presence of risk factors or barriers in children and families. However, it is equally important to note that protective factors and strengths in the family and school context, such as the quality and quantity of exposition in bilingual or multilingual environments, conversational and participative activities, and specific strategies, can promote cultural identity and positive child language development.

This Special Issue will be devoted to understanding the unique and combined effects of family risk or barriers and protective factors and the characteristics of the interactions in the family and school context on child and adolescent oral language development and different intervention proposals in terms of teachers' development processes. Both reviews and original research will be considered for publication.

mdpi.com/si/159413

Special Issue