Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Today, systems and health professionals are focusing more so than ever on the clinical management of emerging diseases. At the same time, in clinical practice, the possibilities that new therapeutic approaches and technologies represent are helping more than ever in the management of all patients, and especially critically ill patients. However, quality in the care of these patients must be addressed, as quality in health care is a key factor in daily clinical practice. It significantly determines the course of a disease and as a result determines the treatment options. We therefore invite the submission of research and review articles to this Special Issue regarding preclinical and clinical research findings on quality of care in patients at all levels of care.
