Message from the Guest Editor

We seek a multiplicity of perspectives and encourage contributors to examine artistic creations as sites of knowledge for African individuals, groups, and communities, and those of African descent. Thus, contributors can also explore the significance of museums, archives, and heritage collections not just as repositories of African descendant people's historical experiences, but as sites at which collective identities, ancestral memories, and knowledge of the self are produced, preserved, shared, recreated, and re-told. We encourage contributors to explore the extent to which common community ancestries are inextricably tied to personal and family lineages (with African roots) in ways that help shape larger national identities.

In addition, we also welcome analyses that are cognizant of the fact that artistic expressions are not produced in a vacuum, and strongly encourage writers to also examine the wider economic, cultural and socio-political milieus that have had an impact upon African and African descendant family lineage structures and shaped their identities in history.
