Message from the Guest Editors

Fungal infections continue to pose a diagnostic and treatment challenge to clinicians and microbiologists worldwide. In recent years, there has been an increase in fungal infections, a change in risk factors and the emergence of antifungal-resistant pathogens. At the same time, in the diagnostic field, new independent culture techniques have been developed. For this reason, we are dedicating this Special Issue of the journal to review the latest research in the field of fungal infection in Europe.

We are looking forward to receiving original submissions of manuscripts from all over Europe, dealing with new risk factors associated with the development of fungal infection, fungal infection in special patient populations, the emergence of new antifungal resistant strains and description of outbreaks, the application of new diagnostic techniques and real-life studies describing clinical experience with new antifungals.
