Message from the Guest Editors

Pain is a difficult and demanding research field involving numerous professional figures. In recent years the mere measurement of pain has shown all its limits, unable to explain even the relapses in the life of a relationship. On the other hand, the biopsychosocial model places the measurement of pain within a more global assessment of the patient of a holistic type. This is the new challenge of pain therapy: to reduce pain and evaluate the patient's functional recovery. For these reasons, this Special Issue intends to involve all professionals who care for the patient with pain in an interdisciplinary context. In this view, all opinions and points of view are welcome because it is only through the integration of the individual disciplines that pain therapy can be carried out according to the biopsychosocial model.
