Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Recent years have brought various breakthroughs in dental sciences, prompting both experienced professionals and newly graduated dentists to continuously build on recent innovations. Dental materials constitute a key component in every clinician's daily practice and, therefore, must be upgraded and developed to foster and improve the quality of dental treatment.

The Special Issue aims to provide the scientific community with new trends regarding dental materials in general, with a focus on composite resins. Research must be oriented around discovering and highlighting new types of materials and their applications related to dental care, specifically composite resins for restorative and aesthetics purposes.

Evidence of using new approaches of routine dental materials is encouraged as well as the use of new materials in routine dental practice.
