Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Following the invention of the "osseointegration" phenomenon by Professor Branemark, dental implantology has rapidly evolved into the standard of care in the treatment of tooth loss. Thanks to a cascade of clinical and technological advancements, many cases that were not treatable by means of a fixed prosthesis in the past can now be rehabilitated seamlessly with implant-supported fixed prostheses. Any newly evolving discipline requires the output of robust science provided by proper research results, thereby fulfilling the information gaps that eventually became the clinical guide. With this Special Issue, I invite researchers and clinicians to contribute to this magnificent field with original research that will be the foundation for the upcoming advancements, improving the lives of many patients.
