Flavonoids are widely distributed natural products with diverse structures that demonstrate biological activities in plants and benefit human health as protective dietary agents. Inspired by this, their chemical study has always attracted the interest of chemists working in the area of Natural Products, Synthetic Chemistry and Medicinal Chemistry. As a result, research on natural and synthetic flavonoids has yielded numerous promising hits and leads for drug discovery.

The goal of this Special Issue is to offer original research papers or pertinent updates to the existing literature on current advances in the study of bioactive flavonoids. This will include identifying new hit and lead compounds and studying their biological potential and mechanism of action.

This Special Issue seeks to provide both information on recent achievements and new perspectives on bioactive natural flavonoids and synthetic analogues for drug discovery. Original articles, short communications, as well as reviews of studies on this topic are welcome.
