Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Wound healing is a deeply particular dynamic various phase process, involving multiple cellular and molecular mechanisms for tissue repair. The synergy of biocompatibility and cellular proliferative actions of these wound dressing compounds is expressed in the healing process acceleration, enhancing structural, functional, and cosmetic properties of the novel grown tissue.

This Special Issue has the main objective of presenting the most recent research regarding the new original tailored wound dressings, enriched with a myriad of natural and synthetic compounds as potential therapeutic and delivery systems for the treatment and management of various cutaneous lesions.
