Message from the Guest Editor

Polymer coating is at the center of numerous technologies that have crucial roles in various applications. These coatings can be deposited, using a wide variety of polymers with varied architecture and properties, onto diverse surfaces by means of various methods. In the field of biomaterial research, the processing and engineering of materials have become top priorities, in addition to their demanding bulk properties. The surface properties of biomaterials are closely related to their biocompatibility and are vital for their success in clinical trials.

This Special Issue ‘Biocompatible Polymers’ of Polymers will share the most important advancements in research on biocompatible polymer coatings, such as wound healing, antimicrobial coatings, tissue engineering implants, bioactive coatings for scaffolds; processing and characterization methods; properties and performance of these biocompatible polymers for clinical and other biomedical applications.
