Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue focuses on religion and spirituality in individual and group psychotherapy. It is clear enough that religion and spirituality can promote mental health, or aspects thereof, but can also be a source of struggle and confusion. Therefore, it is said that incorporating religion and spirituality into psychotherapy can be valuable and influence both the therapeutic process and the treatment outcome. Despite the research and evidence, there is still much ambiguity about this.

The purpose of this Special Issue is to provide an interdisciplinary forum for theoretical and empirical examples of current research. We invite scholars from different psychotherapeutic orientations to submit high-quality papers that focus on the impact of religion and spirituality in psychotherapy. Our perspectives on religion and spirituality are as broad as possible, including being religious with no affiliation, humanistic spirituality, nature or cosmos spirituality and lived religion.

Papers should examine the potential impact and value of incorporating religion and spirituality into psychotherapy on the therapeutic process and outcome or develop new methodological approaches.
