Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

We are calling for papers whose theoretical, methodological, and substantive approaches advance social science approaches to address issues that are frequently marginalised or neglected in global health. This Special Issue aims to offer a space for health topics, geographical areas, individuals and communities, which are all too often vulnerable and neglected in global health research, policy, and practice. We are interested in social science papers which focus on neglected health areas, neglected communities, and neglected contexts.

We are calling for research that explores and builds the evidence base for health equity and people centred approaches to health systems strengthening in these neglected topic areas. We invite researchers from academic and practitioner communities, and we particularly welcome papers that are led by researchers based in the Global South.
