Message from the Guest Editors

Human-computer interaction (HCI) broadens its boundaries, takes an important role in tackling global sustainability issues, and entrenches its multi-scalar perspectives to address complex sustainability challenges.

This special issue aims to publish high-quality research work on the inter-disciplinary field of sustainable HCI (SHCI) in terms of highlighting opportunities for SHCI to contribute in achieving a more sustainable future. Beyond the traditional HCI research which emphasizes efficient, productive, and novel consumer products, we will explore the alternative design concepts such as appropriate technology, slow technology, not-to-technology, negation of design by design, designing digital limitations, and pro-environmental design. Any work on sustainable HCI that has a relation to any of these fields is welcome.

In this special issue, we seek submissions of original research in the field of interaction design and sustainability, demonstrating the diversity of approaches across HCI communities.
