Message from the Guest Editors

Considering the mounting pressure from various stakeholders and the growing awareness concerning the current pandemic situation, organizations have placed green and sustainable production strategies among their top priorities. These strategies are rooted in the successful implementation of the circular economy (CE), a critical element in promoting sustainable development.

Novel findings regarding this research topic would highlight the merits and demerits of CE implementation from organizational and consumer perspectives, suggesting implications for top leadership and governance bodies for enhancing community welfare. Specifically, this research topic encourages compiling advanced research concerning the relationship between various dimensions of sustainability, focusing more on social sustainability and CE.
