Message from the Guest Editors

The inclusion of Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) in our globalized world has caused different deep and fast changes. Especially in the educational field, new digital training contexts are being established and creating a need to change the teaching and learning process in relation to current challenges. For this, it is so relevant to implement innovative actions where the use of ICT is combined with active methodologies.

With this Special Issue, we intend to cover empirical evidence about how Higher Education and the educational praxis is formulating the training of future teachers and to identify good teaching practices that lead to innovation in the classroom through ICT and teaching and learning methodologies focused on students.
