Every new piece of information matters for scientific progress in air pollution assessment, policymaking, and public health protection. The goal/objective of this Special Issue is to keep communities, scholars, and policymakers informed on the research progress on air quality and human health. Specifically, this SI serves as a forum for advancing scientific understanding of environmental changes associated with air pollution and air quality, strategies and/or different measures that the public, particularly urban residents, can employ to lessen and/or mitigate unexpected impacts.
