Message from the Guest Editors

The parent-child relationship constitutes the starting point for future relationships and is important for children's adjustment and well-being. Numerous studies show that a positive parent-child relationship is linked to various positive outcomes in children.

This Special Issue of Youth offers an opportunity to publish high-quality papers relating to parent-child relationships in adolescence and young adulthood. This encompasses both positive and beneficial aspects of the parent-child relationship in these developmental periods, as well as challenges specific to the relationship between parents and children in these ages. Also of interest is how these specific characteristics are related to outcomes for children and parents. We welcome contributions from all the social sciences, including anthropology, economics, family studies, history, law, public health, public policy, social policy, sociology, social work, and psychology. Empirical reports, analytical reviews, and theoretically informed reflections will be considered. Inter- and multi-disciplinary submissions are encouraged.
